

Waste King named as a finalist in this years CIWM Awards for Environmental Excellence

Waste King, the specialist collections, clearance and recycling company, has been named on the shortlist for this years Chartered Institution of Wastes Management (CIWM) Awards for Environmental Excellence.

Online PR News â€“ 24-October-2012 â€“ Waste King, the specialist collections, clearance and recycling company, has been named on the shortlist for this years Chartered Institution of Wastes Management (CIWM) Awards for Environmental Excellence. Waste Kings nomination is in the SME Recycling Performance of the Year category.

Â

The awards ceremony, which will be hosted by writer and TV presenter Kate Humble, is being held at the Marriott, in Grosvenor Square, London, on Thursday 8th November.

Â

Formed in 2007 by Andy Cattigan and Glenn Currie, Waste King focuses not only on providing a friendly, efficient, cost-effective service but also one which is environmentally friendly. In particular, Waste King's Environment Agency-licensed staff ensure that the maximum amount of waste can be recycled and that all the waste collected is disposed of in an environmentally friendly way.

Â

Over the past year, Glenn and Andy have been using their industry knowledge and expertise to: provide a lead to and means for - their local community to promote the environmentally friendly disposal of waste and increase the amount of recycling. They have also instituted innovative approaches to recycling which also help the local community via charitable giving.

Â

Waste Kings recent notable corporate social responsibility (CSR) efforts include:

Rescuing `Colin', a Giant African Land Snail (the snail was being thrown away - in a green `wheelie bin' - by one of Waste King's customers). It's now loaned the snail to a local junior school so that the pupils can look after and study `him', as well as learn more, via Colin, about looking after the environment.

Donating several tonnes of recycled books, DVDs and music CDs to the British Heart Foundation (BHF) as well as tonnes of old clothes to the Salvation Army.

Giving a number of old computers - discarded by its customers - to Matthew, a young man who has severe autism and a fascination with computers. Matthew takes these computers apart and re-builds them - purely for therapeutic purposes - because doing this helps him to cope with his condition.

Building a special `waste cage' for a customer whose staff put any waste products - from plasterboard and electrical goods to `mixed waste' - into the cage. In the cage, these waste products are segregated so that they can be more easily recycled - leaving only a small percentage of the waste to go to landfill, thus preventing unnecessary damage to the environment.

Â

Waste Kings managing director, Glenn Currie, said: Waste King promotes the benefits of recycling not just in environmental terms helpful though that is but also in terms of directly benefiting people, through the work of the BHF and the Salvation Army. The income that the Salvation Army receives from its recycling activities including those of Waste King - helps to fund beds for the homeless, cups of tea for the thirsty and food for the hungry.

Â

Waste Kings policy of linking with charities in this way appears to be unusual for a waste management company, yet its a strategy that benefits everyone and the environment, he added.

Â

Were delighted to have been nominated for these Awards and to have been named as one of this years finalists is an extra bonus.

Â

Naturally, were looking forward to the ceremony and to meeting Kate Humble but the real winner from all those shortlisted for one of these awards has got to be our environment. That way, we all benefit and everyones a winner!
